

Santa Fe Rabbi Picked for CLAL Fellowship Program

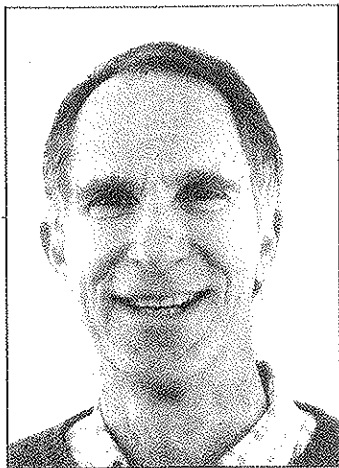

Rabbis Without Borders (RWB), CLAL's new initiative to help rabbis make Jewish wisdom accessible to the wider American public, selected its first group of fellows for its competitive rabbinic fellowship program.

More than 80 applications were received for the 22 spots. Of those selected, Rabbi Nahum Ward-Lev of Santa Fe, N.M. was picked for this prestigious program.

The program, launched this year, is designed to encourage rabbis to "think out of the box," and create a network of interdenominational religious leaders from across North America who can make Jewish wisdom more available to people for enriching their lives.

As the key conveyers of Jewish wisdom, rabbis who can disseminate the insights more easily will not only nurture better teachers and community builders, but will create religious leaders with unique tools to offer the broader culture.

The program is also developing a variety of resources to help rabbis enhance their skills for addressing a variety of audiences. From online learning to one-on-one conversations, participants will work with CLAL faculty to develop methodologies that draw on the texts and tradition in new ways. The goal is for these "spiritual innovators" to see their congregations as more than just members of their school, community or institution.

Since CLAL began in 1974, its mission has been to help prepare the Jewish people for the unprecedented freedom and openness of America. Started by Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg and Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel, CLAL formed a network of rabbis capable of translating Jewish wisdom and practice into useful idioms for contemporary life. RWB is the next phase of this work.
